Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: . will be convenient to assume the sheathing as suited to the local water pressure, and to calculate its S I moment of resistance--when working at the allowable fiber stress S; to subtract this from the bending moment thrown on the whole leaf by the forces in action, and to provide vertical frames having a combined moment of resistance equal to the remainder. In wooden leaves the sheathing and frames work independently of each other. In metal leaves a strip of plating may be considered as acting with the vertical. The width of this strip should be the same as that considered to act with the flanges of the horizontals, vide Par. 121. It should, of course, be left out of consideration in the calculation of the moment of resistance of the portion of the sheathing which acts independently. The number and spacing of the verticals...
